Figure 1 consists of a 3x3 grid of small plots. The rows are labeled 1, 2, and 3 on the left, and the columns are labeled 1, 2, and 3 on the top. Each plot shows a response variable on the y-axis (ranging from 0 to 10) against factor C (1, 2, 3) on the x-axis. The plots show varying degrees of interaction and main effects. For example, in the top-left plot (A=1, B=1), the response is highest for C=1 and lowest for C=3. In the bottom-right plot (A=3, B=3), the response is highest for C=3 and lowest for C=1.

These authors suggest that the use of a more complex, integrated approach to the study of the environment is needed to address the complexity of the environment. They argue that the current approach, which is based on a reductionist view of the environment, is inadequate for understanding the complexity of the environment. They propose a more holistic approach, which takes into account the interactions between the different components of the environment. This approach is based on the idea that the environment is a complex system, and that the interactions between the different components of the system are what determine the overall behavior of the system. They argue that this approach is more appropriate for understanding the complexity of the environment, and that it is more likely to lead to effective environmental management.
